THE extension of Russia eastward has always been a source of uneasiness to England. Alarmists are ever ready to magnify the importance of the strides Russia makes to power and dominion in Central Asia. good deal of needless uneasiness is no doubt felt with regard to the Muscovite movements in the East, and it is too frequently insisted upon that the English possession of India is endangered by her nearer approach to the frontier. But there can be no question that Russia is always more or less aggressive, and though there is no occasion for Britons to become timid on that account, there is good reason for the English Government to keep strict watch upon the policy of St. Petersburg. As we have said before, we believe the reigning Czar to be of a pacific and unambitious disposition, and to be ready and willing to avert war rather than to provoke it. Bu the Autocrat of all the Russias is not exactly the Autocrat that he was formerly. He has no longer the complete despotic authority that his ancestors, even to Nichozas, wielded. Public opinion and the military classes now have a voice in the affairs of the Empire, and the extension of Russian dominion into Central Asia is the desire both of the people and of the army. ALEXANDER II. has therefore been compelled to in some sanction what he never ordered For instance the annexation in 1873 by General Kauffman of the right bank of the Oxus was effected without the Imperial command, but was not disavowed, although the adopt a policy of conquest, simply because it ported to have all been saved: would not have been prudent to run counter

SCANDALS OF THE CARD TABLE. When society is a little less pressed with ngagements than at present and has some isure for reflection, it may with advantage take into its divine consideration the desirabiity of carrying ont a few reforms which are argently required in order to preserve its prestige in the eyes of the vulgar order. Among these, that of olicoking its growing taste for "high play" is one that deserves attention. Gambling has become of late a husiness instead of an amusement, and "scandals," as they are termed, are of frequent occurrence. To sequire wealth by means of card-playing is, to say the least, a demoralising practice which ought not to revail a mong ladies and gentlemen. An attompt to put a stop to these propensities. ON SEEING A PICTURE CALLED "A WINT GALE IN THE CHANNEL [Painted by Henry Moore in 1872, when it was exhibited in the Royal Academy; now in the possession of Mr. . H. Smith Wright, Lenton Hall, Notta.] (See Speciator, 22nd June, 1872.)

I love this ocean picture's pale reserve: No tinta unnatural of nurpling grain, Agure, or opal, mar the much, grey main, The sweep, the ewing, the long froth-churning curve The shore-ward working and confused swerve Of vellowing water; white blooms wear such stain All dashed and muddied with the April rain. No near ambition did the pointur serve! Well that no inboured ship or enti-burst broke-The strong monotony of that sky and surge; Leave, only leave, the line of stormy smoke, The sea-birds dashed upon the neaver verge -Brave in its truth, this occan piece shall be The type for us of Homer's harrestless sea.

Nor only this-lesson of more than art! Who dores, strong in simplicity, despise The evanescent brouties that arise Before his saie, and in true thought apart. Look on straight forward to life's very heart; Who dares, by gift supernal rendered wisely Deem trath more beautiful for all true eyes Than garish things made merely for the mart: Whether he paint, or write, or live his thought.
